A GOOD WINTER TRIP.

Preparations of a Brooklyn Doctor to Visit the South Pole.

There is a young doctor in Brooklyn who is preparing for an expedition to the South Pole. The seasons in the Southern Hemisphere are the reverse of those north of the equator. The months of December, January, February, and March constitute the Summer there.

These cots are arranged in aisles separated by curtains, so as to insure the insufficiency of space, but the atmosphere is kept pure by close attention to ventilation. The entire building—dormitories, hall, and dining-room—is comfortably heated, and at times there is the luxury of brilliant light.

There are 200 cots. Every morning every bed is aired and made up with fresh linens, and a hot water bottle and a clean pillow slip. This laundry work is done by contract. As a representative of Mr. Straus explained, "It is done at clock work, and at very slight expense."

When this project was conceived women and girls were nominated for its benefit.

For more reasons the original plan could not be carried out with the facilities at hand. To make the best use of the church houses and funds the women were given charge of the project, a cheap, clean lodging-house, and the disappointment is known to have been great.

One of the best known lodging-houses for women in the city is on the west side. An average of sixty wrecks of womanhood go there for shelter, every night. There is no room to go straight to destruction, with the result that it is no fault of surrounding influences.

One Saturday night, about dinnertime, there were between twenty women in the house, all of whom were called by courtesy a sitting-room. The forlorn creatures were in the dark, huddled about an old ghost of a stove, with their heads buried in the lowliness of self-esteem imposed by charity. The dim firelight made some of the old gray heads shine like silver.

Any thought of a good meal rapidly that struggled into form was quickly dispelled by the writhed garments and abjection of the women who were waiting for the meal in the same attitude of despair since 4 o'clock. God only knew the sorrow of these lives.

The bedroom in which these creatures were sleeping was awaiting admission was cold and dreary and repulsive.

The sinner was visited to a degree that was unbearable, chilled and ill as it was. The apartment occupied by the inmates of the house lay between two buildings. There were no windows in it. Light came from the roof. The roof was completely filled with rows of dirty, offensive alie to the eyes and the senses.

It is true that the thirty occupants did not have to pay, but then there were no men in the house. The women of the Parish House, white, sweet-smelling and easy as nursery cribs for a nickel a night, and with a breakfast of good bread and bacon, contrasted with the contrast reflects but little credit upon the women who manage the Shelter.

In another part of the building there were two well-made, comfortable rooms surrounding them were a fifth bedroom.

The rooms had been ventilated, the air was warmed from the lower floor, and the bed looked as though they had been slept in.
